The Wages Book of a Fethard Farmer, 1880-1905

By Cormac Ó Gráda

This note is based on the wages book of a prominent farmer from the Fethard area, Michael O'Donnell. The wages book, which is in very good condition, contains over 200 pages measuring approximately 13 inches by 6 inches. It is currently in the possession of Michael O'Donnell's grandson, Brian O'Donnell of Garrinch, Fethard. The book covers a 20-year period between the early 1880s and the early 1990s. All the entries seem to have been made in Michael O'Donnell's own hand.

Michael O'Donnell was born in 1851. The eldest of a family of seven, he seems to have acquired the farm at Bannixtown on his marriage; his wife was Maria Josephine, daughter of John Shea of Bannixtown. O'Donnell's father lived in the neighbouring Kilsheelan until 1895 and died at the age of 82 in January 1933. Some years before his death he moved home from Bannixtown to Byrne's Kiln.

The farm itself is situated on good land about four miles east of the town of Fethard, facing south to the Slievenamon mountains. The wages book gives several hints of Michael's prosperity. On a fly-leaf it reports that in 1894 he insured his property for £500, and his houses etc. for £700. In 1897 he insured the residence and furniture at Bannixtown House for £1,000. For some of the period covered by the wages book he bred and kept riding horses, and he employed a live-in teacher and a music instructor for his daughters. In 1897 he hired Maggie Cummins, "to take Josie to school and to do some cleaning about the house".

Other sources corroborate the impressions of prosperity. The lands acquired by O'Donnell on marrying Maria Shea totalled over 200 acres in the townlands of Tober and Bannixtown. In 1886 he paid James Cullinan, a cooper, £3 15s 10d "for the season 35 firkins". The 1901 census describes his home at Bannixtown as containing ten rooms and 16 outhouses and farmsteadings. By 1911 Bannixtown House had 14 rooms, and Michael O'Donnell was head of a ten-person household, which included four live-in servants.

As noted, Bannixtown was not the O'Donnell family home; Michael had been born not far away in Lower Seskin, Kilsheelan. Two of his brothers became parish priests in Cahir and Dublin. He hunted with the Waterford and Tipperary Hounds and was a keen supporter of the Clonmel Horse Show. "A well-known and popular figure in the Fethard district", O'Donnell had served as a local magistrate and had also been secretary of Tipperary South Riding County Council for several years. In the latter position "he commanded the confidence and respect not only of those who were brought immediately in contact with him but the ratepayers in general". According to his obituary in the [Clonmel] Nationalist (14 January 1933) "he was connected with the leading farming families of Counties Tipperary and Kilkenny".

Such evidence bespeaks wealth and respectability. It also suggests that Michael O'Donnell typified that stratum of strong Catholic farming families that had never quite lost their influence or self-respect before Catholic Emancipation, and whose power was on the rise in the post-Famine decades. Families like the O'Donnells of Seskin formed a true "hidden Ireland", hitherto largely ignored by historians.
However, they are the leading players in Eoghan Ó Neill’s remarkable Gleann an Óir (1988), and recently historians such as Louis Cullen, Kevin Whelan, and Thomas P. Power have been giving them their due. Indeed, Gleann an Óir (pp. 21-2, 30, 33) contains several references to Michael O’Donnell’s paternal forebears, and Eoghan Ó Neill has traced Michael’s roots back to another Michael, his great-grandfather “Daddy Michael” of Lower Seskin (c. 1720-1819).

By allying their fortunes to those of the Butlers of Cahir in the sixteenth century, earlier O’Donnells had salvaged much of the family’s prestige and comfort; the connection later helped the family to survive the vicissitudes of the Cromwellian and Williamite Wars and the Penal Laws. Michael O’Donnell’s in-laws, the Sheas or Shees, were also long established in south Tipperary, and several townlands around Fethard and Mullinahone are named after them.

Like other old Catholic and Gaelic farming families, the O’Donnells and Sheas continued to prosper in a quiet way as tenants of considerable landholdings. Avoiding politics and conspicuous consumption, and largely excluded from the professions, they concentrated on enlarging their holdings, on accumulating dowries for their daughters, and on educating their sons. They married their own kin, valued family traditions, and were slow to let go of the Irish language. Breeding and racing horses were abiding interests. With the gradual democratization of politics in the nineteenth century, these families played leading roles in a succession of parliamentary-nationalist movements.

The first contract in Michael O’Donnell’s wages book dates from February 1880, a few weeks after his marriage. The wages book indicates little sign of any sustained rise in nominal wages paid over this period (compare Bowley, 1899; Fitzpatrick, 1980). Between the early 1880s and the early 1900s he typically paid men 10d-12d per day, 5s per week, or £8-£11 per annum. O’Donnell paid boys and young men about £6 per annum.

Women were typically paid by the quarter or yearly, at a rate of about £7-£8 per annum; only rarely did O’Donnell hire them from week to week. The implied difference between men’s and women’s wages is somewhat smaller than expected. Only further research can reveal whether this difference was representative of Ireland in general or, indeed, Tipperary. If representative, it runs somewhat counter to the doleful conventional wisdom on women’s fate in post-famine Ireland (compare Ó Gráda, 1994: ch. 10, and the sources cited there).

This does not take account of one likely gender inequality: on several occasions, O’Donnell paid shopkeepers in Fethard and Clonmel for boots and dresses for his female servants, and cut their pay accordingly. For example, in 1886 he paid the Bradford Manufacturing Company 5s 3d for a dress and Tobins of Clonmel 6s 3d for a pair of shoes for Marian Kirwan. Presumably women servants had to be more careful about how they dressed for work than the men. Overall, since the cost of living fell somewhat over these decades, a modest rise in living standards is indicated for both men and women.

The wages book refers to over 60 men and over 40 women who worked for O’Donnell during the period covered in the wages book. Entries are usually in the first or second person singular, such as “I’d your wages . . .”, “You got . . .”, or “Watt Power entered my service as horse trainer [sic] on this date”. Though a few had travelled some distance to work for O’Donnell, most employees were local people from Cloneyne and Fethard; several of them have descendants still living in the area. At any one time, O’Donnell would have employed five or six people.

An important feature of these accounts is that they betray a considerable turnover of staff. A few left because they were ill or had been injured at work. Willie Kelly left for home in June 1902 “to recover from effects of a fall off a horse”. In late 1888 Maggie Wall left after working for O’Donnell for less than four months to go to America. One employee died. But most left without any reason being given in the wages book. Whether such a large turnover of labourers was typical of the market for farm labourers, or was due instead to Michael O’Donnell’s reputation as a demanding taskmaster, can only be determined through the study of further evidence of this kind. Certainly the impression given by anecdotal and literary evidence is of a much lower turnover of farm labour than seen here.

The wages book tells us little else about Michael O’Donnell’s affairs in these years. However, an entry in a special account at the end of the book notes costs of £21 “incurred in struggle with landlord”. Another entry reports that Mary Guilfoyle lent Michael’s father £160 at a rate of four per cent per annum in 1886. Michael paid the interest half-yearly, and kept on the loan after his father’s death. He occasionally paid off some of the capital, but Guilfoyle was still due £133.70 in 1899.

A list of the men and women engaged by Michael O’Donnell, and details of their terms of pay and period of employment is given below.
